AWR-302: Pipeline Security for Rural Communities

America's pipeline system stretches across the country like veins and arteries of the human body and much of this system crosses the rural environment. Due to the need of the pipeline infrastructure to reach every part of the country to deliver petroleum and natural gas products that help fuel our economy, it is a target for attacks.

This 8-hr, DHS/FEMA certified course brings together pipeline security stakeholders including the rural emergency response community and the pipeline industry. The course helps to recognize pipeline security threats and identify mitigation strategies to ensure the rural pipeline sector is secure and resilient.

AWR-302: Pipeline Security for Rural Communities

Who Should Attend?

- All First Responders - especially Law Enforcement and Fire Personnel
- Pipeline Industry Stakeholders
- Community Emergency Management Personnel
- Security Infrastructure Stakeholders
- Public Works
- Tribal Agencies

This course will include various participant scenario-based activities to ensure that the emergency responders are able to work seamlessly with the private industry and the various federal agencies that would respond to an attack on the nation's pipeline system. The course objectives will enhance the participants' mitigation, response, and recovery capabilities through both classroom instruction and scenario-based training activities. This format promotes greater understanding and collaboration among the parties responsible for pipeline security, and will enhance operational capabilities between the many partners in response to a rural pipeline security incident.
